

To the esteemed men and women of the Federal Communications Commission,

I am not a particularly active sort of lady in politics. I'm a simple stay-at-home-mom with a love of all things internet. From Youtube gamers to reading the works of just-starting-out writers with a dream. I love learning languages and sharing them with my child and enjoying the things that all of the amazing people across the globe create, all of which is possible because of the net neutrality that people, even the FCC itself, once fought so hard for.

The internet is one of the few places in the world that so many people from different countries, cultures, tongues and socio-economic backgrounds can come together and share the wondrous things that they have in their heads and hearts. The internet has become a culture of its own with it's own sort of lingo, traditions and mores. It is the utmost concern of those of us who call that culture our own that, by rolling back the laws that protect our ability to access that intellectual space, the world as we have come to know it may change for the worst.

We aren't unemployed thirty-year olds in our parent's basements. We are creators, we're parents and children, we're businessmen and women. We are the disabled and enabled, we're peons and leaders alike and we're dreamers hoping to see those dreams realized. Most of all, we are imploring you to defend our rights to an equally accessible and open internet for us all.

So please safeguard our rights, the rights of the internet culture and the rights of the future of information itself.

Many thanks,

A Concerned Constituent.
